

© 2026 Anant Stories. All Rights Reserved.

KHWAAB

PART ONE

...

*A story of friendship, fate,
and feelings left unspoken*

...

Karthik Vijay
&
Anshul Thakur

Prologue

Love is often shown as this big, dramatic feeling something that sweeps you off your feet and changes everything in one moment. But in real life, love is much quieter than that. It grows slowly, through understanding, patience, and trust. It starts in the most unexpected places in shared laughter, in someone just being there without being asked, in small gestures that mean more than any big words ever could.

In this first part of the story, love hasn't shown its full face yet. What you'll see here is something even more special pure, simple friendship. Kanishka and Avnish are two kids from completely different worlds. But somehow, fate keeps pulling them toward each other. Through their little adventures, their fights, their teasing, and their moments of real care they build something that will stay with them for the rest of their lives.

This is the story of how it all began. When they were just kids. When feelings were honest, simple, and free of any expectations.

Chapter 1 — Two Different Worlds

Avnish — Born in Mathura

Avnish was born in Mathura, the sacred city of Lord Krishna. It was a place full of devotion temple bells in the morning, the sweet smell of flowers and incense everywhere, and the joyful noise of festivals like Holi and Janmashtami filling the streets.

His father, an army officer, had a job that meant the family moved from city to city quite often. But no matter where they were posted, Mathura always felt like home. Whenever they returned, they would visit temples together, take part in local festivals, and feel grounded again.

From a very young age, Avnish picked up his father's values discipline, calm, and a deep sense of responsibility. He was a serious boy, but in a gentle way. He liked helping elders, reading books, and spending quiet time near the Yamuna River, just watching the water and thinking.

But every army posting meant packing up and leaving again. For Avnish, every new city was another goodbye.

Kanishka — Born in Kashi

Far away, in the ancient city of Kashi, Kanishka was born. Kashi also known as Varanasi is one of the oldest cities in the world. It is the city of Lord Shiva, where every ghat, every temple, and every narrow lane carries centuries of stories.

Kanishka's father, Rajesh Varma, was a successful businessman. Their home was comfortable, even luxurious. Kanishka had beautiful clothes, good food, and the best schools. On the outside, she had everything.

But her father was always busy. Late nights at the office, long trips, endless phone calls she often found herself alone in that big, quiet house. She never called it loneliness. She just called it a feeling she couldn't explain.

What Kashi gave her, though, was something money couldn't buy. Growing up in a city full of ancient wisdom and spiritual energy, she learned to look beyond material things. She wrote in her diary every evening, she loved stories, and more than anything, she wanted real connections friendships built on honesty and warmth, not just politeness.

Chapter 2 — A New Beginning in Vrindavan

Life had its own plan for both of them.

Avnish's father retired from the army after years of dedicated service. After a lifetime of moving around, he wanted to settle somewhere peaceful. Vrindavan, a small holy town near Mathura, felt just right. It was calm, spiritual, and full of warmth. The family moved there, ready to finally put down roots.

For Avnish, it felt different from other moves. Vrindavan had something special about it the sound of kirtan drifting from temples, the smell of flowers at every corner, the friendly faces in the market. He was curious about what life here would bring.

Around the same time, Kanishka's father decided to expand his business to Vrindavan. It was a practical decision, but there was also something about the town's peaceful energy that had stayed with him after a past visit. He decided to relocate the whole family.

Kanishka had mixed feelings. She was excited about a new place, but leaving Kashi the only city she had ever known, her friends, her familiar streets was hard. Still, something about Vrindavan felt like it was calling her. She didn't know why.

The Meeting at the Bookstore

It was a lazy Sunday afternoon in Vrindavan. Colonel Shankar Pratap Singh Avnish's father was taking a slow walk through the market lanes, the way retired men do when they have nowhere to be.

He was passing by a small bookstore when a sleek black car pulled up on the side of the road. Out stepped a well-dressed man in a suit Rajesh Varma followed by a little girl in a bright yellow dress, clutching a small diary and looking around the street with wide, curious eyes.

That was Kanishka. And she spotted a book in the store window almost immediately.

Kanishka: (excited) "Papa, I want that one! Tales of the Mahabharata!"

Colonel Singh, who happened to be standing right there, smiled.

Colonel Singh: "Good choice, young lady. That's a classic."

Rajesh turned around, a little surprised, then smiled warmly.

Rajesh: "Ah, you must be Colonel Singh! I've heard your name from the neighbours. I'm Rajesh Varma we just moved here."

The two men shook hands and started talking easily, the way people do when they feel comfortable with someone right away. Kanishka, meanwhile, had already walked into the bookstore.

Meeting Again at the Temple

That same evening, as if the day had more plans for them, both families ended up at the Banke Bihari Temple without knowing the other would be there.

The temple was busy and glowing with lamplight. Devotees were chanting and offering prayers. Kanishka was walking with her mother through the crowd when she spotted a familiar face the uncle from the bookstore, crouching down to help a boy tie his shoelaces.

Kanishka: (tugging her father's sleeve) "Papa, look! That's the uncle from the bookstore!"

Rajesh walked over with a laugh.

Rajesh: (smiling) "Well, it seems fate has decided we should meet again!"

Colonel Singh: (chuckling) "It really has. These days, not many people come to temples. It's good to see."

Their wives also joined in, instantly hitting it off. The two families walked around the temple together, talking and laughing like old friends. And at some point, Avnish and Kanishka were introduced to each other properly for the first time.

The First Real Conversation

While the parents were still chatting, the two kids were given a little space. Kanishka wasted no time.

Kanishka: (looking him up and down) "So... do you like stories? Or are you one of those boring math people?"

Avnish: (raising an eyebrow) "I like stories. But math is important too, you know."

Kanishka: (dramatically sighing) "Ugh. That's so typical. My dad's a businessman, so all I hear at home is numbers. I'm already tired of it."

Avnish: (teasing) "You're being a little dramatic, don't you think?"

Kanishka: (pretending to be offended) "I am not dramatic. I am expressive. There's a difference."

Avnish laughed despite himself. She laughed too.

Avnish: (grinning) "Okay, fine. I'll help you with math if you tell me your stories."

Kanishka: (shaking his hand like a businessperson) "Deal."

They both burst out laughing at how seriously she shook his hand. It was the most natural thing in the world.

Dinner and a New Bond

Before the evening ended, Rajesh invited Colonel Singh's family for dinner at their new home. The meal was warm and full of good conversation. The fathers talked about everything from the local market to life in the army. The mothers exchanged recipes and childhood stories.

And Kanishka showed Avnish her book collection. He hadn't expected it to be so big or so well organized.

Avnish: (genuinely impressed) "You actually read all of these?"

Kanishka: (proudly) "Most of them. The rest are for rainy days."

By the time everyone said goodnight, something had already taken root not just between the two families, but between two kids who didn't yet know how important they were going to become to each other.

Chapter 3 — Destiny: The School Surprise

The first day at Vrindavan Public School arrived with all the usual nerves.

Avnish stood near the school gate, books under his arm, watching other kids run around and greet each other. He knew no one. He told himself that was fine. He was good at being on his own.

He found the big banyan tree at the edge of the playground and sat down under it, opening his book with the careful, focused look of someone trying very hard to look like they don't care that they're alone.

Inside the classroom, when he walked in and looked for a seat he stopped dead.

Sitting by the window, already settled and looking around with her usual curiosity, was a girl he recognized.

Kanishka: (eyes going wide) "Wait are you Avnish? From the temple?"

Avnish: (completely frozen) "Kanishka? From the bookstore?"

The whole class turned to look at them.

Kanishka: (laughing nervously) "No way. How are you HERE?"

Avnish: (slowly grinning) "I could ask you the same thing! I thought we just bumped into each other by accident that day!"

Kanishka: (smirking) "What is with you and following me everywhere?"

Avnish: (teasing right back) "Hey you followed me first. You just didn't know it."

Kanishka: (rolling her eyes) "Well. Looks like I'm stuck with you now."

They both laughed. Around them, the classroom slowly went back to its own business. But something had quietly clicked into place between them like two puzzle pieces that had been waiting in different boxes.

The teacher walked in just then. As the class settled, Kanishka leaned over and whispered:

Kanishka: (whispering) "Just try not to be the boring math guy, okay?"

Avnish: (whispering back with a grin) "Only if you try not to be the overly dramatic storyteller."

Under the Banyan Tree — Where It All Started

A few days into school, the playground was buzzing with the usual lunchtime energy kids running, shouting, chasing each other around. Avnish sat quietly under the big banyan tree, arranging his books. He wasn't sure how to join in. His shy side was stronger than his curious side, at least for now.

That's when he heard footsteps confident, purposeful ones and looked up to find Kanishka standing in front of him, pigtails bouncing, head tilted, hands on her hips.

Kanishka: (with a grin) "Hey, you! Why are you sitting under a tree like an old man?"

Avnish: (firmly) "I'm not an old man. I'm studying."

Kanishka: (raising an eyebrow) "During lunch break?"

Avnish: (hesitating) "I just... don't know what to do during lunch break."

She sat down right next to him. Without asking. He blinked.

Kanishka: (matter-of-factly) "That's because you don't have any friends yet. Am I right?"

Avnish: (quietly) "...Maybe."

Kanishka: (cheerfully) "Don't worry. I'll fix that. by the way. You can call me Kanu."

Avnish: (narrowing his eyes) "Kanu sounds like a boy's name."

Kanishka: (pretending to be deeply offended) "Excuse me?! Kanu is a very cool name."

She studied him for a moment with exaggerated seriousness, like a scientist examining a very strange specimen.

Kanishka: (nodding slowly) "And you... you look like an Avocado."

Avnish: (blinking) "An... Avocado?"

Kanishka: (very seriously) "Yes. Round-ish face. Very serious expression. Probably soft on the inside though."

Avnish: (staring at her) "That's not even what does that even mean?"

Kanishka: (giggling) "Why do you look so serious all the time? Smile a little, Mr. Avocado."

Avnish: (under his breath) "This school is weird."

Kanishka jumped up and held out her hand.

Kanishka: (confidently) "Come on, Avocado. I've already done two or three rounds of this school. I know all the best spots. You're coming with me."

Avnish: (sighing) "Fine. But stop calling me Avocado."

Kanishka: (cheekily) "No promises."

He took her hand. And just like that, a friendship began loud and unexpected and nothing like anything Avnish had ever had before.

Chapter 4 — Building the Bond

Over the next few weeks, Avnish and Kanishka became inseparable. Their personalities were completely different. Kanishka talked all the time, had an opinion about everything, and charged headfirst into every situation. Avnish was quieter, more careful, but sharp and funny in his own dry way. They balanced each other out without even realising it.

Cricket and the Worst Advice Ever

One afternoon during lunch, Kanishka dragged Avnish to the playground where the other kids were playing cricket.

Kanishka: (pulling him by the arm) "Come on, Avocado! You can't sit under that tree every single day."

Avnish: (protesting) "I told you don't call me that!"

He ended up playing anyway. When it was his turn to bat, he walked to the crease looking like he was walking into an exam he hadn't studied for.

Kanishka, standing nearby, shouted helpful advice.

Kanishka: (cupping her hands around her mouth) "Don't overthink it! Just close your eyes and swing the bat. You'll hit something!"

Avnish: (glaring at her) "That is genuinely the worst advice I've ever heard."

He ignored her, focused, and actually hit the ball. Not a great shot, but enough to run. The other kids cheered.

Kanishka: (grinning) "See? I told you. Not completely useless."

Avnish: (dryly) "Your confidence in me is overwhelming."

She laughed, and he smiled that quiet, small smile he saved for moments when she caught him off guard.

Chapter 5 — Footprints of Friendship

As the months passed, the two of them turned Vrindavan into their own little world. Every evening after school, they would wander through the town exploring temples, testing street food, getting into small amounts of trouble, and just talking. Always talking.

The Hidden Temple

One afternoon, they were walking through the busy bazaar past stalls of laddoos and bright bangles, past vendors shouting over each other, past kids playing in every corner when Kanishka suddenly stopped and pointed.

Kanishka: (excited) "Hey! Let's check out that temple!"

It was a small, quiet temple tucked at the far end of a narrow lane half-hidden, easy to miss. Avnish hesitated.

Avnish: (uncertain) "I don't know... it looks a bit..."

Kanishka was already walking toward it.

Kanishka: (over her shoulder) "Don't be such a scaredy-cat."

Inside, the air was cool and still, and the soft smell of incense made everything feel calm. An old priest smiled at them and placed small bowls of prasad in their hands. Kanishka immediately started eating. Avnish hesitated again.

Avnish: (carefully) "Shouldn't we wait till we're outside?"

Kanishka: (rolling her eyes) "Rules, rules, rules. You're such a soldier's kid."

Avnish: (grinning) "And you're such a businessperson's daughter always doing things your own way."

She laughed. They sat on the temple steps and ate their prasad in comfortable quiet, watching people pass by on the lane outside.

Racing to the River

On the way back, without any warning, Kanishka broke into a run.

Kanishka: (shouting back) "Race you to the river!"

Avnish blinked, then ran after her, laughing. She was faster. She always was. By the time he reached the bank of the Yamuna, she was already standing there, slightly out of breath, smiling like she'd won a trophy.

Avnish: (panting) "You're too fast. Give me a head start next time!"

Kanishka: (laughing) "Too slow, Avocado!"

They sat by the river for a while, watching the water catch the last of the afternoon light. The moment was quiet and warm.

Kanishka: (nudging him) "Hey, remember the first time I dragged you to that creepy temple on the corner? You were so scared!"

Avnish: (groaning) "I wasn't scared. The door was making a really bad sound."

Kanishka: (grinning) "You literally whispered that there might be a ghost."

Avnish: (defensively) "I said it at a normal volume. And YOU were the one who screamed when that cat jumped out of the bushes yesterday."

Kanishka's face went a little red.

Kanishka: (mumbling) "That was completely different."

The Paper Boat Race

Later that day, they turned into a lane where a group of kids had set up a little paper boat race in a shallow stream of rainwater. Kanishka stopped walking the second she saw it.

Kanishka: (already moving toward them) "We have to join in!"

Avnish: (flatly) "This is ridiculous."

Kanishka: (looking back at him) "It's called fun, Avocado."

She folded her boat quickly, neatly, with the ease of someone who had done it a hundred times. Avnish took much longer. His first attempt came out looking like a crumpled napkin. His second wasn't much better.

Kanishka: (watching him struggle) "You're hopeless, honestly."

He pushed his boat into the water. It immediately flipped over. Hers sailed all the way to the end. She threw her arms up like she'd won a national championship.

Avnish: (muttering) "The current was uneven on my side."

Kanishka: (handing over her winning boat) "Sure it was. Here the champion gives you a gift. Try not to look too devastated."

Avnish: (taking it) "Thanks, Captain Bossy."

The Great Mango Heist

A few days later came the incident that would become a story they'd tell each other for years.

It was mango season. They were walking past the temple garden when Kanishka slowed down and stared at a tree near the wall. Its branches were hanging low, heavy with ripe, golden mangoes.

Kanishka: (in a quiet, dangerous tone) "Avnish. Look at those mangoes."

Avnish: (already suspicious) "No."

Kanishka: (innocently) "I haven't said anything yet!"

Avnish: (crossing his arms) "You didn't have to."

Ten minutes later, Avnish was crouching near the wall while Kanishka climbed onto his shoulders to reach the low-hanging branches. She had just pulled one mango free when they both heard heavy footsteps from around the corner.

The temple guard.

Kanishka: (hissing urgently) "Run!"

They bolted. Through one lane, then another, then a third, zigzagging through Vrindavan's winding streets until they finally collapsed behind a large peepal tree, completely out of breath and trying very hard not to laugh too loudly.

Avnish: (gasping) "You are absolutely insane."

Kanishka: (holding up the mango like a trophy) "And you're my accomplice. So we're both insane now."

Avnish: (grumbling) "I'm only an accomplice if we don't get caught."

They split the mango between them. It tasted incredible the way things only do when you've run for them.

Chapter 6 — The Stormy Afternoon

The day had been perfect.

They were near the Yamuna, as they often were in the evenings, talking about nothing and everything, when the sky changed. The clouds came fast dark and heavy and the wind picked up with a low rumble that meant business.

Kanishka: (looking up) "Uh-oh. I think we should head back."

Avnish nodded. But before they could even take a step, a strong gust of wind hit the wooden cart of a nearby vendor, sending it crashing sideways. Avnish grabbed Kanishka's arm without thinking and pulled her out of the way.

The cart hit the ground exactly where she'd been standing.

For a second, neither of them said anything.

Avnish: (catching his breath) "You okay?"

Kanishka: (a little shaken) "Yeah. Yeah, I'm okay. That was close."

The rain started properly then heavy and fast. They ran toward the road, but the path was turning muddy beneath their feet. Kanishka's foot caught in a rut, and she went down hard, twisting her ankle.

Kanishka: (wincing and trying to stand) "Ah I can't put weight on it."

Avnish was beside her in a second. He looked at her ankle, then turned and crouched down with his back to her.

Avnish: (firmly) "Get on my back."

Kanishka: (worried) "Avnish, no you'll fall too. The mud is..."

Avnish: (cutting her off) "Kanu. Get on."

Something about the way he said her nickname not teasing, just quiet and serious made her stop arguing. She climbed onto his back, holding his shoulders, and he stood up and started walking.

It wasn't smooth. The mud slipped under every step. The rain was pouring. But he kept going, slow and steady, until they reached an old shed near the temple compound where the roof held and the rain couldn't touch them anymore.

He set her down carefully. They were both completely drenched. He sat down beside her, trying to catch his breath.

Kanishka looked at her ankle swollen, but probably okay. Then she looked at him.

Kanishka: (quietly) "You didn't have to do that."

Avnish: (shrugging it off) "Yes I did."

Kanishka: (smiling a little) "You're going to remind me of this forever, aren't you?"

Avnish: (straight-faced) "Obviously. For the rest of your life, whenever you're being stubborn, I'm going to bring this up."

She laughed a short, surprised laugh. Then she got quiet.

Kanishka: (sincerely) "You're not just my friend, Avnish. You know that? You're like... family."

He looked at her. Outside, the rain drummed on the roof.

Avnish: (simply) "Same. Always."

He didn't say much more. He never did when things really meant something. But the way he said it was enough.

Chapter 7 — The Promise Under the Banyan Tree

By the time the storm had passed, the evening had turned soft and golden. The whole town smelled of wet earth and flowers. The sky had cleared, and the setting sun was painting everything in shades of orange and pink.

They made their way to the old banyan tree at the edge of the temple garden their tree. The one they always ended up at, without planning to. The branches spread wide and low, and the roots were thick and old and rooted so deep they could probably feel the river.

Kanishka leaned against the trunk, her ankle resting carefully. Avnish sat beside her.

Kanishka: (softly) "Today made me realise something."

Avnish: (curious) "What's that?"

Kanishka: (looking at him) "You're not just my Avocado. You're my anchor. I tease you all the time and I'm going to keep teasing you but you're the one person I know will always show up."

Avnish: (smiling faintly) "And you're the person who drags me out of my own head and into actual life. Which is annoying, honestly. But I think I need it."

She laughed softly. Then she looked up at the tree for a moment, thinking.

Kanishka: (extending her little finger) "Let's make a promise. Right here, under this tree."

Avnish: (raising an eyebrow) "What kind of promise?"

Kanishka: (seriously) "That no matter where life takes us how far, how busy, how much time passes we always find our way back to each other. Even if it's just one message, one call. Just enough to say: I haven't forgotten you."

He looked at her pinky finger. Then at her.

Avnish: (linking his finger with hers) "I promise. Even when you're talking nonsense about ghosts and stolen mangoes."

Kanishka: (grinning) "And you'll always have me. Even when you're being the boring math guy."

They laughed. And then, without saying much more, Avnish reached into his pocket and took out the small pocketknife his father had given him the one he always carried. He pressed the blade gently against the bark of the banyan tree and carved slowly, carefully:

A + K

Kanishka: (watching it appear in the bark) "There. Now it's real. Our bond is right here, in this tree."

Avnish: (softly) "Forever."

They sat there in the quiet for a while after that, watching the last bit of light disappear behind the hills. The stars were just beginning to come out, one by one.

A Feeling Avnish Couldn't Name

Avnish was still looking at the initials he'd carved when a strange feeling crept in one that was different from the usual easy warmth he felt around her.

He glanced at her from the corner of his eye. She was twirling a strand of hair around her finger, looking at the horizon, completely lost in her own thoughts. She looked... the same as always. And somehow completely different.

There was something in his chest. Warm and a little unsettling. Like a feeling that had been there quietly for a while and had only just decided to make itself known.

He looked away quickly.

Then she leaned closer to point at the bark.

Kanishka: (laughing) "Hey you carved my initial a little crooked. That's not how you spell my name!"

Her shoulder brushed his. It was nothing. Barely anything.

But his heart did a strange little skip, and he had to look away again and pretend to fix the carving.

Avnish: (clearing his throat) "It's fine."

Kanishka: (tilting her head) "You're acting weird. Are you okay?"

Avnish: (quickly) "I'm fine."

He wasn't. Not completely.

He stared at the two letters in the bark. A and K. Side by side. Something about that the permanence of it, two names pressed into something that would outlive both of them settled in his chest and refused to leave.

Was this what attachment felt like? Or was it something else? Something he wasn't ready to put a name to?

Kanishka: (gently) "Hey. Where'd you go? You've gone all quiet."

Avnish: (barely above a whisper) "Nowhere. It's nothing."

But even as he said it, he knew it wasn't nothing. It was everything. And it was just beginning.

The banyan tree stood over them, holding their names in its bark, saying nothing at all the way old things do when they've seen this kind of moment before, and they know exactly how the story goes.

Chapter 8 — Just a Feeling

As the sun finally dipped below the hills, they both stood up to leave. Kanishka dusted off her dress. Avnish put his knife back in his pocket.

They had started walking when Kanishka suddenly slowed down. She looked back at the banyan tree not casually, but like she was looking for something in it. Or like she was trying to remember something.

Avnish: (noticing) "What?"

Kanishka: (quietly, almost to herself) "Some promises don't just belong to this lifetime. I think they carry forward. Even when the people who made them have forgotten."

Avnish: (confused) "What do you mean?"

She was quiet for a moment. Then she spoke again, slowly.

Kanishka: (choosing her words carefully) "I just feel like there's more to this. To us. Like this isn't the beginning like something happened before, and we're somewhere in the middle and we just don't know it yet."

Avnish tried to make sense of that. He couldn't.

Avnish: (softly) "You're being mysterious again."

Kanishka: (with a small, strange smile) "Maybe I am."

She turned and started walking. Avnish stood there for a second longer, looking at the tree.

At A + K, carved into the bark.

At the two letters sitting side by side, as if they'd always been there.

A quiet wind moved through the branches above him a sound like a long, slow breath, like the tree was exhaling after holding something in for a very long time.

He told himself it was just the wind. He told himself Kanishka was just being dramatic, the way she always was.

But as he walked away, the feeling in his chest didn't leave. It stayed. Quiet and patient, like something that had been waiting a long time and wasn't in any particular hurry.

Like it already knew how this story would end.

~~~End of Part One~~~

Thoughts — The Unspoken Battle Between Love and Friendship

One-sided love is a quiet kind of pain.

It's loving someone completely, while they see you as nothing more than the person who's always there. It's standing beside them, watching them smile, and knowing that your heart beats for them in a way theirs never will for you.

Loving a best friend is both a blessing and a curse. They are your favourite person in the world. And they will never know it the way you need them to.

The hardest part isn't even the love itself. It's the fear. One wrong word, one moment of honesty at the wrong time and you lose everything. Not just the love you never had, but the friendship you did. The laughter, the late nights, the inside jokes, the small ordinary moments that meant everything. One misunderstanding and it all disappears.

Love, when not understood, starts to feel like a burden. Friendship, when questioned, starts to feel like a lie. And in the end, both people are left broken not because of love, but because of silence and fear.

But love doesn't have to destroy friendship. Real love the patient, selfless kind doesn't demand anything. It doesn't force itself. It just stays. It shows up in storms. It carries people when they can't walk. It carves names into old trees without needing to explain why.

Misunderstandings can break things. But love, when it's given freely and without conditions, can also heal. And sometimes the most powerful kind of love is the one that stays quietly in the heart of a true friend, and never asks for anything in return.

The First Glimpse

~ A Verse ~

*Her first glance, like the feeling of a moonlit night,
A new story unfolding, a feeling so light.
When our eyes met, the world seemed to pause,
Every heartbeat echoed only her cause.*

*That charm, that grace, like peace to my soul,
A strange kind of magic, a dream's gentle pull.
The world stayed unaware, but she ruled my heart,
That first meeting the dawn of love's start.*

*I wonder, was it just a fleeting feeling?
Or a divine message, something more revealing?
Whatever it was, now life longs for her embrace,
In every prayer, I seek her hand's grace.*

~ ~ ~

Thank you for reading

By

Karthik Vijay & Anshul Thakur